

Boab Metals New Corporate Presentation

Boab Metals (ASX: BML)

The lead and silver company looking to enter production in 2025 has issued an updated corporate presentation.

With offtake partners signed up this looks a very realistic project with low capex and a healthy margin due to the silver credits.

The lead and silver company looking to enter production in 2025 has issued an updated corporate presentation.

With offtake partners signed up this looks a very realistic project with low capex and a healthy margin due to the silver credits.

Whilst all the focus is on lithium and EV related metals, lead is still a significant metal in its own right, but isn't very sexy so is overlooked by investors.

I like Boab because they are in an unpopular metal (from an investor perspective) yet are quietly going about their business and securing offtake partners ahead of a production decision.

The capex looks quite reasonable for a mining project, so, barring a collapse in the price of lead, which is unlikely in my opinion, this looks a decent development project with a fair chance of going into production within two years.

Unusually for an Australian listed company, the share count is low, so there's a lot to like here in my opinion.

BOAB are on my watchlist for now, the end of the Australian tax year in June may present an opportunity to buy a few cheap shares, so firmly on the radar.
