

Dow off strongly after London closes

Dow Jones

The Index is falling strongly currently, which does not bode well for London in the morning if the Far Eastern markets also retreat overnight.

A number of factors are at play all at once, including the newly announced US “trade war” with China, rising interest rates, falling bond prices, and the prospect of a war between the major powers starting in Syria as tensions ratchet up in Deir Azzor, and Afrin.

The Dow Jones is falling strongly, which bodes not bode well for London in the morning if Far Eastern markets also retreat overnight.

A number of factors are at play all at once, including the newly announced “trade war” with China, rising interest rates, falling bond prices, and the prospect of a war between the major powers starting in Syria as tensions ratchet up.

I have been awaiting a market correction for some time, and the combination of a number of factors coming together all at once looks to be the perfect storm, and it will be interesting to watch the London open in the morning.

The trade war talk, and the Chinese belligerent response have all the makings of a skirmish, and Donald Trump looks to be trying to pick fights all over the globe at the same time, unsettling markets.