This Pre-PDAC event was quieter than normal, and a lot less vibrant. It seems to have been overshadowed by the Red Cloud

Conference the previous two days.

The format is that “selected” (IE those companies that are prepared to pay the fee, around C$10,000 I was told) appear with the newsletter writer that promotes their stock.

The newspetter writer makes a personal presentation and then intoduces the companies he “selected” to bring with him.

The companies participating were, in the main, early stage exploration juniors, just the sort of companies I’m personally avoiding investing in currently, due to them continuously falling in price, not being able to raise capital easily, and suffering considerable dilution when they can raise.

I saw one company I liked out of the whole show, and I may participate in a financing for them, because of management previously creating shareholder value, and the project location.

I saw one other company that does look considerably undervalued, and I will follow because I like the people that are running the company and they may be due a bounce.

Apart from these everything was dull and it was hard to get interested in what were a bunch of early stage developers.

Interestingly the show livened up around 3pm as people arrived for the drinks at 4pm!

A pleasant enough day and I found some interesting people to talk to, and lunch was lovely and plentiful, so not a total waste but I hope the main event is better.

The highlight of the day was standing a few feet away from Canadian Prime Minister Justin Trudeau as he exited an event and we were held on the pavement.
