The London Mines and Money show suffers because of covid.

The London Mines and Money conference opened today in Islington, and was clearly suffering the effects of the new covid scare, as around a dozen booths were empty, and the audience was sparse, compared to first days in recent years.

I feel for the organisers as a couple of weeks ago everything looked good for the show, as they had more companies than usual, and less service providers.

They have taken covid measures in the catering, and I chose a very tired looking lump of lasagne in a cardboard pot, instead of the very watery looking fish curry. Not great but better than nothing.

The one plus point was that the coffee stations were open all day, rather than in small time slots, ensuring there was no rush, a very sensible move in my opinion.

As an event organiser myself I can testify to the pressure of trying to arrange an event where you hope that people will attend, and it's really stressful. Mines and Money have been really unlucky that the new variant arrived just before their show.
