Mining Review 4th February 2024

The week was once again all about the FED and US interest rates, with positive economic data suggesting a March rate cut was unlikely, causing markets and gold to pull back.

Cabral Gold, i-80 Gold, and Orla Mining all reported strong drilling results this week.

City Investors Circle Mining Review 4th February 2024

The week was once again all about the FED and US interest rates, with positive economic data suggesting a March rate cut was unlikely, causing markets and gold to pull back.

Gold remained above the key $2,000 level despite the hawkish interest rate comments. This was probably helped by the US announced intention to bomb targets in the Middle East, which eventually occurred on Friday night, after days of announcing their intention to do so.

Turning to companies on our watchlists, there were some positive drill results from Cabral Gold, i-80 Gold, and Orla Mining reported during the week.

One disappointment was the results from Gold Road Resources where production for the year was at the low end of guidance, and AISC higher. This resulted in a share pullback, and a share that was trading at just above A$2 on the 29th December is now back at A$1.51!

This is really disappointing after waiting so long for GOR to break through the A$2 resistance level, and one reason why I was opposed to them commencing dividend payments.

The guidance for 2024 is around the same so despite such as strong gold price the share price looks as though it will settle down at this lower level once again, and it's incredibly disappointing.

On the plus side, despite paying the dividend they have a strong treasury and significant investments in IGO and De Grey, amongst others, so the company looks healthy moving forward.
