Mining Review – Sunday Update 13th June 2021

Gold fell at the end of the week due to a rising US dollar, despite US inflation coming in higher than expected.

The eyes of the mining world have been focused on the Peruvian election this week, where a pro-mining right wing candidate is trailing the anti mining left wing candidate by a wafer thin margin. Fraud allegations look like dragging this out for a while.

Mining Review – Sunday Update

13th June 2021

Gold fell at the end of the week due to a rising US dollar, despite US inflation coming in higher than expected. It seems there is a sell off every time the price reaches $1,900, and then a buy back around the $1,850 mark. It's becoming a predictable trade.

The eyes of the mining world have been focused on the Peruvian election this week, where the anti mining socialist candidate looks set to claim victory by a wafer thin margin.

The issue, from a mining perspective, is that the left winger, Pedro Castillo, has made many different threats towards the mining industry, including raising taxes and nationalisation. Whilst the latter is extremely unlikely, in my opinion, the former looks a bolt on certainty.

Peru produces 12% of world copper, and higher taxes would deter future investment in the country, the second highest producer in the world, at a time when copper consumption is forecast to soar thanks to EV production increasing.

General mining news

BHP has averted a strike at their large copper mines in Chile, namely Escondida and Spence, by coming to a last minute wage deal. This deal eases supply concerns, that had driven copper prices up recently.

The Chinese government have announced plans to use use state reserves of critical metals as a method of avoiding speculation on metal prices. Copper, aluminium, and zinc, along with other commodities, such as pork, are included.
