Mining Review Sunday Update — Powell's Hawkish Tone Crashes

FED Chairman Jerome Powell delivered a hawkish speech at Jackson Hole, favouring containing inflation over the state of the economy and markets.

Leading up to the speech I thought I detected a more cautious tone, and had expected him to deliver something that would have given investors and the markets hope that rate increases would soon be done and the pivot could reasonably be expected as inflation subsided.

Sadly he delivered something far worse, with his focus firmly on subduing inflation regardless of whether it causes a recession or not. The markets responded to that accordingly, and we had a massacre up until the close.

This drove the Dow down 1,000 points and caused gold to slump, taking down miners and the ETF indices by several percentage points.

Zach Hill, Head of Portfolio Management at Horizon Investments stated;

"We do believe the Fed when they say that rates are going to be higher for longer and we've seen some repricing of the cuts in 2023. "We think there's more to go on that front and it's likely to continue to fuel equity volatility from here."

A sombre finish to the week as we head into a Bank Holiday weekend in the UK.

Turning to the mining companies we follow,

There was some good announcements made during the last week, all lost in the market maelstrom on Friday, sadly.

Good news is more often than not simply creating liquidity events enabling selling in these markets.

Cabral Gold were the most active, reporting the results of two drill campains their Cuiu Cuiu project in Para State, Brazil. Alan Carter continues to deliver the exploration news on a regular basis.

Minera Alamos reported a record month of gold production, which has been constrained due to drought conditions limiting their water supply, but the company is still not reay to declare commercial production.
