Northern Miner London Symposium November 2025

Took place at 133 Houndsditch for the second year in a row. This venue also hosts the 121 Mining Conferences. It's a brisk walk from Aldgate station, and easy to find.

As London mining events go it was an intimate affair with around 20 mining companies present, as well as some illustrious visitors from the Canadian Mining Hall of Fame.

I only managed to find four companies of interest, and had good meetings with all of them.

I met Firefly for a catchup, and was impressed by the progress they are making at the Ming copper mine in Newfoundland. I don't see an urgency to invest here yet, but it's one that remains firmly on my watchlist.

My second meeting was with Firefly's neighbour in Newfoundland, New Found Gold, a company that has fallen from grace somewhat, with retail investors disappointed with the Mineral Resource Estimate. This has perhaps created an opportunity, I am going to review again before making a decision about investing.

I then met Brad O'Rourke of Scottie Resources, possibly the best presentation I saw all day. Scottie have moved forward and they plan to commence production in 2028, not too far away as we're in 2026 in a months' time.

What I like is the district scale of their project, with high-grade gold intercepts all over their project area.

My final meeting was with American Eagle Gold Corp. This looks a bit too early stage for my current focus, but I have added to my personal watchlist.

So, in conclusion, the London Mining Symposium is a small mining conference with a handful of companies at the stage I prefer, with an interesting panel of experts, in a good venue. I plan to attend next year.
