PDAC 2018 – Final day

PDAC 2018 – Final day. Wednesday is a rather strange day at the PDAC, as it starts an hour earlier than the other days, at 9 am, and closes three hours later at 12 pm.

Arriving early this morning the aisles were quiet and there were great swathes of booths unattended, a suggestion that the previous night's festivities had taken their toll perhaps?

.

.

.

PDAC 2018 – Final day. Wednesday is a rather strange day at the PDAC, as it starts an hour earlier than the other days, at 9 am, and closes three hours later at 12 pm.

Arriving early this morning there were great swathes of booths unattended, a suggestion that the previous night's festivities had taken their toll perhaps? There's always a feeling of the party the night before on the last morning of PDAC, and there's a reason for that! Around 10am people poured in and the booths were manned, and it as busy for the last couple of hours, which it normally isn’t.

My final evening of the show was spent as the guest of a Canadian mining services firm in the Ritz Carlton Hotel, where they served up the most wonderful food and provided some excellent wines to wash it all down with, from 5 pm until 11 pm. Fortunately this was only a short walk from my accommodation!

.

In conclusion, it was an uneventful PDAC in my experience, nothing to get too excited about, and I wish I had a pound for every time I heard the word “undervalued”!

.

My memories are of:

- Battery and base metals being more popular then the precious metals
- The show looked visibly busier than last year on all the days
- Meeting a few good companies that I hope to tempt to present in London this year
- Enviroleach coming so close to winning the $1 million Disruptive Mining Award
- The weather being much milder than usual and no snow
- The show catering reaching a new low

600
800
TASMANIA
WHERE THE WORLD IS GOIN
www.mrt.tas.gov.au